How can you improve your sense of direction?

It's true, smartphones have maps, but you can't always get a signal, and phones get lost, so don't expect your phone to be your answer. The first tip is to look around and pay attention to what you can see. What's on your left? What's in front of you? What's the tallest building you can see? Remember, when you are going back to where you started, the building that was on the left will be on the right! When you go somewhere new, check an online map to have an idea of the place before you arrive. But don't just do that: write. Make a note of the address and the street names where you are going. Writing things down helps you remember them. Modern buildings like airports, shopping malls and even car parks are so big and they all look the same. Remember things like fountains and certain shops to help you find your way around. Finally, give yourself plenty of time. If you think you need 30 minutes to get somewhere, start your journey 45 minutes before you need to be there. If you leave things to the last minute, you are more likely to make a mistake..

Example: How do you improve your sense of direction?

- A 30

Ben Akintola, 30, was snowboarding in the French Alps under a clear blue sky on the last Saturday of his holiday when there was an avalanche. Ben, who started snowboarding when he was in his teens, realised he was in danger when he heard the sound of thousands of tons of snow rushing down the mountain. Avalanches can travel at speeds of 100 kilometres an hour, so Ben knew he couldn't outrun the wall of snow. He was desperately trying to get out of the path of the avalanche when it hit him with full force and knocked him unconscious. He woke much later in the middle of the night in pitch darkness. He was lying on a narrow, icy ledge. Although he was in pain, a quick check indicated that he had no broken bones. Amazingly, he still had a mobile phone signal, so he called a friend a thousand kilometres away in Britain. His friend called the French rescue services. 'I was waiting for what seemed like hours on that narrow ledge. I was beginning to give up hope,' he said.
